— A NOVEL BY —

He broke off abruptly. They had both become conscious of Michael's eyes following them. Michael's eyes held a gleam of jealousy as he viewed this intimate little scene between his wife and the man who once had been reported to be her lover.

They were back in the privacy of their own apartment, however, before Michael said a word. Then he burst out:

"I'm sorry we had to run into Marlowe, tonight, Starr. I intended for you never to see him again."

Starr's face was strained. She had known unconsciously that it would be like this. All through their honeymoon in the country they had not mentioned Lance's name at all, as though by common consent, Michael had asked her nothing about the man. But she could not forget—

Once, in that despairing mood, she had tacitly admitted that Michael she had taken Lance Marlowe as her lover. That she had said it when she did for Michael's sake meant nothing more. If only she had not!

And now, because of Lance, after their long days of peace, they were in the midst of conflict again, tormented with memories which refused to be lived down.

It all was so plain to Starr. . . .

"Gossip linking her name with Lance's," her own voice crying out to Michael on that crazy night, telling him that she had been Lance's mistress, trying to make him believe that it was more than Starr could bear. She planned to let her husband suspect nothing. Her voice raced.

"Michael, I've wanted to explain to you so many times, only somehow I couldn't. There has never been anything between Lance and me—never! I tried to tell you. All of that awful time I was living a lie! Michael, you do believe me, don't you? You must believe me, don't you? You must, looking down on her said: 'Of course I do,' pressing her small cold hands very lightly in his big ones. "You're my wife, and I love you."

But there was a strange echo to his voice which chilled her, in spite of his words.

CHAPTER XVII.

Busy days again. Except for that slight undercurrent of an imperfect understanding which Starr felt to be a dividing line between Michael's moods, happy days. So much to be done. And, as always at such times, little chance to think.

Michael thrust himself into business with a will, making up for lost time. He left it to Starr to hunt out every cold, and she had about come to the determination that they should not live in an apartment house at all, but should take one of those attractive houses out in Forest Hills. So much more like a home, with an upstairs and down, your own lawn, and a lovely wisteria vine that would be a purple cloud in the summer time.

Michael made a little objection. It was so far away from business, he said. But with a wifely concern for his health, Starr insisted that the drive into town each morning would be just the thing he needed. Perhaps he would not get any fresh air otherwise.

So it went, with most of their discussions at breakfast, at the lunch counter, when Starr sometimes took with her husband, and during the peaceful evenings they spent together in the Egyptian living room with the Del-el-Bahari fresco. Life was perfect again—almost.

Then catastrophe. It was on a December morning not far from Christmas time when Starr received the first of the threatening letters.

She was seated across the breakfast table from Michael in the little alcove overlooking the shining East River when Sapphire came in with the morning mail. She handed it all to Michael, who ran his eye through it all at once and handed over an envelope addressed to Starr. It was addressed in a rough, informed hand. Not to Mrs. Michael Fairbourne, but simply to Starr Ellison.

Michael laughed quietly as he placed up at her, handing her the letter.

"I thought everybody knew that we were married. Better advise your friends, Starr."

That was ridiculous. Actually she had not a friend in the world, now, that she had cut herself loose from the life she had known here in New England town, who probably had not the faintest idea she was still in the land of the living. No friends—only acquaintances. Like Lance, and Stephanie, Tom Ranger, and perhaps Margorie Brownstone and the rest of that fast-stepping crowd. Certainly they could not be called friends.

With a curious pang of fear that caught in her throat, she tore open the envelope. A half-strangled cry was forced back from her lips as the words came to her. Then came the words "I have been through her like a cold dagger."

On a single sheet of paper was written in a hand that she had never seen before:

"You cannot escape your fate. You and the man you love."

There was no signature, only a queer scrawl at the bottom of the page that may or may not have been her own writing. Starr did not know. Starr did not know. Starr did not know.

"What is it? What's the matter, Starr? Don't look like that!"

Somehow she pulled herself together, tried to smile with unconcern.

"It's nothing," she said, with too elaborate carelessness. "Nothing at all. But her lip shook, and her face was as white as the paper she held in her hand."

Michael's eyes seemed to be peering down into her very soul. He said: "Nonsense! There is something the matter. You look positively sick."

The note was crumpled in her nervous fingers. She stared at him in a stricken silence. Michael held out his hand. Masterful again.

"Star, let me see that letter."

Her hands flew up, and in her shock her eyes were tragically, she shook her head.

"I can't, Michael. It isn't any of your business."

The familiar line on Michael's jaw stood out. He spoke steadily.

There should be no secrets between husband and wife. Let me see that letter!"

It had become a matter of vital importance now. Michael was demanding a husband's rights. She Starr knew she must refuse him. She would refuse him, no matter what happened. And he was probably thinking—

Suspicion clouded Michael's face.

Starr did not dare imagine what he was thinking. But she was thinking—remembering. . . . That whispered conversation with Lance, and now came a mysterious letter which she would not explain. Did he think that she and Lance was communicating clandestinely, and only the chance of this letter having arrived at an inopportune time had betrayed the secret?

Dully Starr repeated, as she shook her head, "I can't!"

Michael did not ask her again. He simply got up from the table, leaving his breakfast half finished. He stalked out into the entry way and yanked his hat and coat from the hook. Starr heard the outer door bang behind him. It was the first time since their marriage that he had gone out of the apartment without kissing her goodbye.

The distraught bride paced her long living room in a mental torment. She paid no attention to Sapphire's peevish comments as if she had not heard her.

What was the meaning of this ominous letter? Where had it come from? Who knew? It was like a direct answer to the fear which had been growing upon her slowly since the day her honeymoon ended.

In spite of her busy days, she had had long hours in which to brood, hours when she had felt the future, too, defying her inexorable fate, planning, working for a home in which she and Michael should spend long years together. She might have known the futility of that!

Weeks had sped by rapidly. With a dazed feeling Starr now suddenly realized that it was many weeks—weeks that had flown into months—since the doctor had told her of the fate of her son that it would be "You'll live another six months."

Suppose his prophecy came true? Suppose the doctor had fallen upon her, as all along she had felt to be the depths of her son that it would be "You'll live another six months."

Was it not now—her forbidden happiness?

Royal Robes

Royal School of Needlework Engaged On Fine Embroidery

Thirty-five needlewomen have been chosen by Lady Smith-Dorrien, principal of the Royal School of Needlework, for the Coronation work which will be done at the school during the next three months. They will be engaged mainly to fine embroidery work on the canopy to be embroidered for the King and Queen during the coronation, on the King's robe, and probably on the Queen's dress and train.

The King's robe will be that which was made at the school in 1802 for King Edward VII, and it is to be sent to the school to be repaired, if necessary. It is of cloth of gold, embroidered all over with the royal arms, red Tudor roses, green shamrocks, purple thistles and silver eagles.

The canopy will be made entirely at the school, of cloth of gold, with raised silver eagles round the border. It will be embroidered with white satin, and supported at each corner by four slender silver poles. The Queen's dress will be made of white satin and will be embroidered all over in white and gold. Designs for the embroidery of the dress include Dominion and Colonial emblems. London Times.

Yacht Will Cost Million

Challenger For America's Cup Is Building Luxurious Craft

The most luxurious yacht believed ever to have been built for a private owner is now under construction for O. M. Sproh, aircraft millionaire and challenger for the America's Cup. It is his new yacht, a 100-foot motor yacht, which will cost him $1,000,000, bringing his total outlay for yachts to $3,000,000. Guests will fare well with accommodation for 24, and such extra equipment as a life-lined swimming pool, a gymnasium, a hospital, a ball room, and a kitchen. The yacht will be decorated in modern style, some in period. There will be golf practice nets and sliding panels in the sun tan glass on the promenade deck.

America's first insurance company was organized in 1753 at Charleston, S.C. A fire in 1740 destroyed half of Charleston and ruined the company.

DICK GETS A NEW PARTNER

OF course, children should never drink tea or coffee. But do you realize that the caffeine in tea and coffee disagrees with many grown-ups, too? If you are bothered by headaches or indigestion, or find it difficult to sleep soundly . . . caffeine may be to blame. Why not try Postum for 30 days? Postum contains no caffeine. It is simply whole wheat and bran, roasted and slightly sweetened. It is easy to make, and costs less than one-half cent a cup. It's a delicious drink, too . . . and may prove a real help.

New Regulations Effective

Restrictions Placed On Germany's Restaurants Under Nazi Plan

Fewer dishes on the bill of fare, fewer table cloths in restaurants, and therefore less laundry, are some of the new measures to help Germany become self-sufficient in her food and raw material supply under the new four-year plan.

This was announced at the hotel and restaurant proprietors' meeting at Hannover recently. The new regulations became effective with the advent of the new year.

No bill of fare, even in the most expensive restaurants, is permitted to offer more than four different soups, 10 "dishes of the day," 10 fried or grilled dishes, six egg dishes, six different kinds of cold and four kinds of warm hors d'oeuvre, or 15 cold dishes such as cold fish, various special salads and cold fish.

Ordinary salads, vegetables, game and poultry may only be offered according to season. No stipulations have been made regarding cheese and dessert. Hot fish is the only major dish not subject to any restrictions, as the consumption of fish is to be encouraged.

Menus of the larger restaurants may offer no more than six major dishes, of which one must be fish, while menus of medium-sized restaurants may offer no more than three dishes, of which one must be fish.

Restaurant tables having marble or wooden tops, which can be closed, are not to be covered by table cloths. Saving can be made in laundry, it is said, without impairing either cleanliness or hygiene.

Cutlery, crockery and kitchen utensils in new restaurants are to consist of glass, porcelain or metal. The use of plastic or other materials is a vital necessity, in order to save silver, nickel and copper.

Industry For Alberta

News that Utah interests are planning a woolen mill for Magrath is further evidence that Southern Alberta is developing industrially. The direction of these industries for which it is best suited, states the Lethbridge Herald. A woolen mill, the centre of a district which produces 2,500,000 pounds of wool annually, and in an area where woolen goods are a vital necessity for the residents, sounds logical.

A column of air one mile square, extending from 50 feet to 14,000 feet above the earth contains, on an average, for all seasons, about 25,000,000 insects.

Must Be Competition

Government Order Regulates The Sale Of Militia Horses

The government will tolerate no combinations in restraint of trade nor secret combinations in restraint of free competition—even in the sale of militia horses. From time to time the noble steeds are found unfit for further service, or for other reasons, have to be sold. In any case, the national defence department will see that the sale is fair.

Under order No. 2, tabled in the House of Commons by Ian Mackenzie, minister of national defence, it is set forth that when one of these chargers has to be sold the sale has to be done by public auction, and the C.O. of the regiment promoting the sale "will attend the auction or attend."

The reason is clear. The C.O. continues that it will be the duty of this officer to see that no combination exists to keep down the price. If such a combination is apparent, he will, after consultation with the auctioneer, postpone the sale.

The auctioneer gets a $5 fee if the sale price is $100, and five per cent if over. However, there might not be much in it for the auctioneer because, says the order, he "will pay for all advertising."

Little Helps For This Week

Remember O Lord Thy tender mercies and Thy loving-kindnesses, for they have ever been of old. Psalm 25:6.

Thou wilt be true to me
I trust the love that never can grow cold.

I trust in Thee.
Be not so much discouraged in the night of what is yet to be done, as comforted in His good-will towards thee. I like. He has chastened thee with rods of sore afflictions, but He ever take away his loving-kindness from thee, or did His forgiveness ever fall thee in the darkness night that (yet, behest) thee? We call Him the God of our fathers, and we feel there is some stability at center who we can tell our cares to One watching at our right hand and by whom our cares have been remembered and removed.

Difference Between Registered and Certified Seeds

The essential difference between registered seed and certified seed is that registered seed conforms to certain very high grade standards and is descended from elite stocks of varieties, the hereditary qualities of which have been proved and strictly maintained under pedigree registration; while certified seed needs only to conform to somewhat lower grade standards, and it need not necessarily descend from elite or registered stocks.

Seed becomes certified through the issuance by the Dominion Seed Branch after due inspections of a statement certifying with respect to some important characteristics of the crop; for example, freedom from such grass in grass crops, or freedom of variety names in cases of varieties which have become important economically, though they have not yet been sufficiently purified to conform to the standards set for the certified grade.

In some cases certification is granted for crops of a variety which has been accepted as eligible for registration, but of which no approved elite stock has been made available to serve as a foundation for available stocks of the variety, for example Red Bots 222, Reward and Garnet wheats.

The oil and mining industries have developed the most skilled and able men of the world in the exploration of Mother Earth. Many of them are eminent scientists or engineers whose education has cost them years of study and the industries many millions of dollars in experimenting. But it is singular how often they fall down in their diagnosis. A geologist or engineer may think he can say with certainty that no mining operation can be initiated on a certain location with any prospect of reasonable return. A scientist decides there is no oil at a certain spot. An inexperienced wildcat hunter comes along and discovers the greatest field in history which was the case for instance with the last big find, the East Texas field. This had been most thoroughly investigated and experimented with by some of the ablest engineers and geologists of the country and pronounced dry.

The industries lack a lot of dull whiffs and dull many dry holes every year at points carefully selected by skilled men. Usually the experts are sure they are on the right spot. But often they are not. Numerous dry holes had been drilled in the vicinity of the East Texas field, but not in the right place.

Not many years ago the Fiji Islands were regarded as the most outlandish spot on the globe. To-day they are within the sphere of Canadian trade.

A few weeks ago a consignment of Canadian chickens was dispatched to these islands, and already the Hawaiian Islands know favourably about Canadian poultry, the shipment of Canadian chickens which arrived at Honolulu before Christmas brought many favourable comments.

M. F. Hamilton had the misfortune to slip and fall on the ice while skating and fracture his left wrist.

"Strike me pink," there hasn't been a picture show since, on account of the highway being completely blocked.

The cast of the forthcoming play, "The Ghost Train," sponsored by the I. O. D. E., are rehearsing assiduously under the direction of Miss Helen Holm.

Among those who took advantage of the cent-a-mile excursion to Calgary last week were: A. McCullough, D. D. Farmer, G. M. Campbell, L. Volney, Mrs. B. McDonald, Mrs. Harry Smith, Mrs. Vanbesin and others.

Mr. and Mrs. J. O. Bell are comfortably located in the Wales hotel, Calgary and Mrs. Bell has improved in health.

Mrs. F. Clever returned to her home from the local hospital on Monday where she has been a patient for the past week.

Mr. and Mrs. Ray Walker of Ponoka are visiting at the home of the farmer's brother, J. Walker. Mr. and Mrs. Walker were motoring to Vancouver, but on account of the roads being blocked, they were forced to remain in Champion.

Two or three severe cases of the flu have been reported this week, other cases being very mild. The attendance at the school has not been affected to any noticeable extent.
